

Why am I always thinking about money?

What else is there to think about? Money is power. Everybody else is thinking of money, don't be worried. Even those who are thinking of the other world are also thinking of money. Money represents power; with money, you can purchase power.

Your saints are also thinking of money – they call it virtue. By virtue, you can purchase a better house in heaven and a better car. A few people are not that greedy: they are thinking only about money. A few people are greedier, they think of the other world.

The whole world is thinking in terms of money. Those who think in terms of power politics are thinking in terms of money because money is nothing but a symbol of power. That's why you can go on accumulating more and more money, but the desire to have still more never leaves you – because thirst for power is unlimited, it knows no end.

People are thirsty for power because deep down they are empty. Somehow, they want to stuff that emptiness with something – it may be money, power, prestige, respectability, character, virtue. Anything will do; they want to stuff their inner emptiness.

There are only two types of people: those who try to stuff their inner emptiness, and those rare precious beings who try to see the inner emptiness. Those who try to stuff it remain empty, frustrated. They go on collecting garbage; their whole life is futile and fruitless. Only the other kind, very precious people who try to look into their inner emptiness without any desire to stuff it, become meditators.

Meditation is looking into your emptiness, welcoming it, enjoying it, being one with it, with no desire to fill it – there is no need, because it is already full. It looks empty because you don't have the right way of seeing it. If you put your mind aside and look into your emptiness, it has tremendous beauty, it is divine, it is overflowing with joy. Nothing else is needed. Only then a person stops thinking about money, stops thinking about power, stops thinking about paradise – because he is already in paradise, because he is already rich, because he is already power...

Live the moment, drop the future, and money will lose its glamour. Live the moment with such totality and abandon, as if there is no other moment to come to you again, as if this is the last moment. Then all desire for money and power simply leaves you. If suddenly you come to know that today you are going to die, what will happen? Will you still be interested in money? Suddenly all desire for money will leave you.

I will not tell you to renounce money. That has been told to you over the ages; it has not changed you. I am going to tell you something else: celebrate life, and obsession with money disappears automatically. And when it goes on its own accord, it leaves no scratches, it leaves no wounds behind, it leaves no trace behind.

Summary of the Editorial

1. Money as Power: Many people think about money constantly because it represents power, a way to exert control and achieve comfort and respect in society.
2. Universal Obsession: The obsession with money spans across all levels of society, including those pursuing spiritual goals or political ambitions, as these often also translate into a quest for power.
3. Endless Desire: The pursuit of money never truly satisfies, as it's part of an endless thirst for power that stems from an inner emptiness.
4. Filling the Inner Void: People use money, prestige, and even virtue to fill this inner emptiness, but it only brings temporary satisfaction and can lead to frustration.
5. Two Types of People: According to the passage, there are those who try to fill their inner void with external possessions and achievements, and rare individuals who seek to understand and accept this emptiness.
6. Meditative Acceptance: Those who embrace their inner emptiness without trying to fill it are the meditators, finding peace and fulfillment from within.
7. Inner Joy and Abundance: By welcoming this emptiness, one discovers it is already rich and full of beauty, negating the need for external sources of fulfillment like money or power.
8. Living in the Present: The passage suggests that truly living in the moment diminishes the allure of money and power.
9. Impermanence of Life: Realizing life's transience can reduce attachment to material desires, as in the face of death, money loses its significance.
10. Celebrating Life: The author advises not to renounce money, but to celebrate life with joy and gratitude, which naturally diminishes material obsessions.
11. Freedom from Desire: When one no longer clings to money or power, peace is found without leaving scars of unfulfilled desires.
12. True Wealth is Within: Fulfillment is a state of mind, available to those who appreciate their inner world rather than the external trappings of wealth.
13. Mind as an Obstacle: A restless mind sees emptiness as something negative, whereas a quiet mind perceives it as divine and overflowing with joy.
14. The Futility of Greed: Pursuing money and power does not satisfy the deeper need for meaning; it only brings more longing.
15. Path to True Happiness: Embracing inner emptiness and living fully in the present moment leads to real wealth – a life free from the relentless pursuit of money.
